

No cloning

The no-cloning principle is a fundamental property of quantum mechanics which states that given an unknown quantum state there is no reliable way to produce extra copies of that state. This means that information encoded in quantum states is essentially unique. Now this is sometimes very annoying, such as when you want to protect quantum information from outside influence, but it is also sometimes very useful, such as when you want to communicate securely with someone else.