Secure Communication

When two people communicate, they often do not want their messages to be intercepted by a malicious third party. Secure communication is the general practice that tries to prevent such malicious reading. The most important modern way of secure communication is called encryption. Here a message is scrambled beyond recognition by using what is called an encryption key. This message can only be descrambled by someone who possesses the same key.